Lead Writing Center Consultant

SNC Writing Center
400 3rd St
De Pere, WI 54115

Being an English Major fundamentally changes how I communicate with the world. It makes me a better communicator, writer, thinker, and a better person. Though I believe myself to already have an active sense of awareness, my major has undoubtedly enhanced my critical thinking and analysis to train a new sense of understanding.

Having the opportunity and experience of being a lead writing center consultant allows me to gain leadership experience in the workplace in several different avenues. The critical thinking and analysis abilities that I have gained enhance my ability to adaptively and successfully perform the duties outlined as a lead consultant. Through seeking understanding and communication, working with others, and transparency and honesty, I provide necessary strengths to the communal workspace.

One thing that I believe is most notable about me is that I am not afraid to ask questions, and I would rather revisit the same question multiple times in order to be certain of an answer, then to leave room for miscommunication. This is largely due to my English Major experiences. Every time the meaning of a text is asked— be it novel, poetry, prose, or otherwise— it is never the same meaning as another. Even if you ask again after rereading a passage, chapter, or complete work, the meaning changes, and this is just as applicable to any question in a workplace. Whether the question is as simple as asking the time or assessing large scale problems, the ability to be and remain proactive in times of stress and peace is a necessary quality to critically solve problems, something that I find not only necessary as an English Major, but as a human being.

Asking questions and affirming understanding in this job is essential to increasing successful communication. When it comes to communication, it is better to have it and not need it than to need it and not have it, as a lack works based on luck and assumption, whereas a surplus creates a space for secure understanding and clarification. Being able to work with others is essential to leading groups successfully. In collaborating, the ideas of others seem more communicable. If flaws or complications are not properly explained, they are easily replicable. In having transparency, it allows room for growth.

Becoming a Lead Writing Consultant allows me to advise others in their process of mentoring others. By creating and maintaining a schedule, continuing to have appointments, and guiding consultants, I learn the way I've found most effective, by teaching. Being an English Major has taught and continues to teach me that who I am and what I know is important. Most of all, being an English Major has shown me that one of my greatest strengths is that I care.
